Overview

Grace Gyles focuses her practice on labour and employment law matters. She advises employers on a broad range of workplace matters, including employment agreements, workplace policies, and employment-related issues arising in day-to-day operations. She also brings a diverse legal background, with experience in international relations, corporate transactions and reorganizations, emerging companies, litigation, and policy analysis.

Prior to joining Littler, Grace worked at a leading Canadian business law firm, where she gained experience in labour and employment as well as commercial, corporate, venture capital, and real estate matters.

During law school, Grace developed a particular interest in international law, human rights, and dispute resolution. She completed an exchange term at the University of Copenhagen Faculty of Law in Denmark and worked as a clerk for Marcia V. J. Kran, former member of the United Nations Human Rights Committee, in Geneva, Switzerland. She also participated in the Allard Law International Justice and Human Rights Clinic, where she gained experience in international law, policy development, legal research, and human rights work.

Her undergraduate studies included academic experiences at the Australian Catholic University in Sydney, Australia, and the University of Waterloo, further developing her interests in international affairs and public policy.
